The old French word signifies a youth, as well as a groom, or yeoman; and accordingly Cotgrave says, "in old time it was a more honourable title; for all young gentlemen, until they came to be eighteen years of age, were termed so; besides those that waited in the king's chamber, and who were for the most part gentlemen, [who] had no other title than of 'valets de chambre,' until that Francis the First, perceiving such as attended him to be no better than 'roturiers,' [plebeians, or low persons,] brought in above them another sort, and caused them to be stiled, 'gentilhommes de la chambre;' presently after which the title of valet grew into disesteem, and is at the length become opposite unto that of gentilhomme." Menage, among various opinions as to the etymology, notices, "valad, Hebr. qui signifie enfant;" but inclines to Du Cange's derivation of the word from vassalletus, low Lat. dimin. of vassallus. VEIN. n. s. [veine, Fr. vena, Latin.]

1. The veins are only a continuation of the extreme capillary arteries reflected back again towards the heart, and uniting their channels as they approach it, till at last they all form three large veins; the cava descendens, which brings the blood back from all the parts above the heart; the cava ascendens, which brings the blood from all the parts below the heart; and the porta, which carries the blood to the liver. The coats of the veins are the same with those of the arteries, only the muscular coat is as thin in all the veins, as it is in the capillary arteries; the pressure of the blood against the sides of the veins being less than that against the sides of the arteries. In the veins there is no pulse, because the blood is thrown into them with a continued stream, and because it moves from a narrow channel to a wider. The capillary veins unite with one another, as the capillary arteries. In all the veins perpendicular to the horizon, excepting those of the uterus and of the porta, are small membranes or valves; like so many half thimbles stuck to the side of the veins, with their mouths towards the heart. In the motion of the blood towards the heart, they are pressed close to the side of the veins; but if blood should fall back, it must fill the valves; and they being distended, stop up the channel, so that no blood can repass them. Quincy.

1. Conqueror; vanquisher; he that gains the advantage in any contest. Victor is seldom used with a genitive; we say the conqueror of kingdoms, not the victor of kingdoms; and never but with regard to some single action or person: as we never say, Cæsar was in general a great victor, but that he was victor at Pharsalia. We rarely say Alexander was victor of Darius, though we say he was victor at Arbela; but we never say he was victor of Persia.

This strange race more strange conceits did yield;
Who victor seem'd, was to his ruin brought;
Who seem'd o'erthrown, was mistress of the field. Sidney.

He might have found the same expression in Beaumont and Fletcher. Dr. Johnson has considered the word only as an adjective.

UMBRA'TILE.† adj. [umbratilis, Lat.] Unsubstantial; unreal. Mr. Mason observes, that Dr. Johnson's definition and accent of this word are wrong: the former is, "being in the shade," which Mr. Mason changes into "passing like a shadow," with an example from Evelyn; the latter is on the second syllable, which, however harsh, appears to have been so pronounced in our old poetry; and therefore Mr. Mason might have been less dogmatical as to the accent on the first.

Posture and motion of the body's act.

U'MPIRE.† n. s. [This word Minsheu, with great applause from Skinner, derives from un pere, Fr. a father. Dr. Johnson. — There can be no doubt that Minsheu, and those who follow him, are here mistaken. The etymon is the Latin impar, as I have observed under our old word impier. To this Latin word umpire has indeed been long referred. "An umpire — one who is chosen by two, four, or any even number of arbitrators (on their being equally divided on their award) to give his casting vote: it is a variation of impar for odd." Cleland, Voc. 156. My learned friend, archdeacon Churton, has observed to me, that in the Oxf. Reg. Cur. Cancell. from 1434 to 1469, the expression "impar electus est inter, &c." occurs, fol. 172.; where impar undoubtedly means umpire.] An arbitrator; one who, as a common friend, decides disputes. It is by Browne taken simply for a judge in a sense not usual.

'Twixt my extremes and me, this bloody knife
Shall play the umpire; arbitrating that,
Which the commission of thy years and art

UN.† A Saxon privative or negative particle answering to in of the Latins, and α of the Greeks, on Dutch. It is placed almost at will before adjectives and adverbs. All the instances of this kind of composition cannot therefore be inserted; but I have collected a number sufficient, perhaps more than sufficient, to explain it.

The examples, however, though numerous, might have easily been made more; for almost every adjective has a substantive and an adverb adhering to it, as unfaithful, unfaithfulness, unfaithfully. Un is prefixed to adjectives with their derivatives, as unapt, unaptness, unaptly; and to passive participles, as hurt, unhurt; favoured, unfavoured: it is prefixed likewise to participial adjectives, as pleasing, unpleasing, but rarely in the verbal sense expressing action; we cannot say the dart flew unwounding, though we say the man escaped unwounded. In and un may be thus distinguished. To words merely English we prefix un, as unfit; to words borrowed in the positive sense, but made negative by ourselves, we prefix un, as generous, ungenerous. When we borrow both words we retain the Latin or French in, as elegant, inelegant; politick, impolitick. Before substantives, if they have the English termination ness, as unfitness, ungraciousness, it is proper to prefix un; if they have the Latin or French terminations in tude, ice, or ence, and for the most part if they end in ty, the negative in is put before them, as unapt, unaptness, inaptitude; unjust, injustice; imprudence; unfaithful, unfaithfulness, infidelity. Dr. Johnson. — It is true, as Mr. Mason has observed, that one uniform effect is not always created by un prefixed; it does not always imply negation. Some of Mr. Mason's additional examples deserve notice; and some are also now supplied, which Dr. Johnson and himself might, perhaps without impropriety, have selected. There is scarcely a reader, I dare say, who could not offer many more.

WA'TER.† n. s. [waeter, Dutch; pæcep, Saxon; from the M. Goth. wate, aqua.]

1. Sir Isaac Newton defines water, when pure, to be a very fluid salt, volatile, and void of all savour or taste; and it seems to consist of small, smooth, hard porous, spherical particles, of equal diameters, and of equal specifick gravities, as Dr. Cheyne observes; and also that there are between them spaces so large, and ranged in such a manner, as to be pervious on all sides. Their smoothness accounts for their sliding easily over one another's surfaces: their sphericity keeps them also from touching one another in more points than one; and by both these their friction, in sliding over one another, is rendered the least possible. Their hardness accounts for the incompressibility of water, when it is free from the intermixture of air. The porosity of water is so very great, that there is at least forty times as much space as matter in it; for water is nineteen times specifically lighter than gold, and consequently rarer in the same proportion. Quincy.

(where he writes it Welsh.) I differ from him in it, because I observe that ch is usual in such nouns, whenever a consonant precedes the final letters, as Dutch, French, Scotch: sh is always preceded by an i, as English, Irish, Scottish, &c. Nor is the form of lch repugnant to the use of our language, for we have several words so terminated, as filch, milch, &c. I should therefore write Welch." WHIG.† n. s. [The south-west counties of Scotland have seldom corn enough to serve them round the year; and the northern parts producing more than they need, those in the west come in the summer to buy at Leith the stores that come from the north; and from a word, whiggam, used in driving their horses, all that drove were called the whiggamors, and shorter the whiggs. WILL with a wisp. n. s. Jack with a lantern.

Will with a wisp is of a round figure, in bigness like the flame of a candle; but sometimes broader, and like a bundle of twigs set on fire. It sometimes gives a brighter light than that of a wax-candle; at other times more obscure, and of a purple colour. When viewed near at hand, it shines less than at a distance. They wander about in the air, not far from the surface of the earth; and are more frequent in places that are unctuous, mouldy, marshy, and abounding with reeds. They haunt burying places, places of execution, dunghills. They commonly appear in summer, and at the beginning of autumn, and are generally at the height of about six feet from the ground. Now they dilate themselves, and now contract. Now they go on like waves, and rain as it were sparks of fire; but they burn nothing. They follow those that run away, and fly from those that follow them. Some that have been catched were observed to consist of a shining, viscous, and gelatinous matter, like the spawn of frogs, not hot or burning, but only shining; so that the matter seems to be phosphorus, prepared and raised from putrified plants or carcasses by the heat of the sun; which is condensed by the cold of the evening, and then shines. Muschenbroek.

Will-a-wisp misleads night-faring clowns
O'er hills and sinking bogs. Gay.

1. This preposition might perhaps be exemplified in many more relations, for its use is very frequent, and therefore very lax and various. With and by, it is not always easy to distinguish, nor perhaps is any distinction always observed. With seems rather to denote an instrument, and by a cause: thus, he killed his enemy with a sword, but he died by an arrow. The arrow is considered rather as a cause, as there is no mention of an agent. If the agent be more remote, by is used; as, the vermin which he could not kill with his gun, he killed by poison: if these two prepositions be transposed, the sentence, though equally intelligible, will be less agreeable to the common modes of speech.

Dr. Johnson. — I may add the barbarous Greek τζαννὸς, a fool; zanni, Ital. sannio, Lat. Mr. Horne Tooke has observed, that zany and nizy are both from the same Italian word, viz. sanese; zany, from the former, and nizy from the latter part of the word; and that Sanese, or a native of Sienna in Italy, was equivalent to a fool, may be learned from many Italian books, as well as by conversation with the Florentines. He accordingly refers to some Italian comedies in proof. Poggius, I may add, mentions a native of Sienna thus: "Pasquinus Senensis, vir dicax ac jocosus." Facet. p. 468. Yet zane appears, as Mr. Nares has observed, to be the true etymology, from Florio's old Italian dictionary; in which zane is rendered, "the name of John, also a silly John, a gull, a noddy."] One employed to raise laughter by his gestures, actions, and speeches; a merry Andrew; a buffoon.

In this present age, wherein zeal hath drowned charity and skill; meekness will not now suffer any man to marvel, whatsoever he shall hear reproved by whomsoever. Hooker.

If I had had time to have made new liveries, I would have bestowed the thousand pound I borrowed of you: but it is no matter, this poor show doth better; this doth infer the zeal I had to see him. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Had I but serv'd my God with half the zeal

Good men often blemish the reputation of their piety by over-acting some things in their religion; by an indiscreet zeal about things wherein religion is not concerned. Tillotson.

True zeal seems not to be any one single affection of the soul; but rather a strong mixture of many holy affections; rather a gracious constitution of the whole mind, than any one particular grace, swaying a devout heart, and filling it with all pious intentions; all not only uncounterfeit, but most fervent. Sprat, Serm.

When the sins of a nation have provoked God to forsake it, he suffers those to concur in the most pernicious counsels for enslaving conscience, who pretend to the greatest zeal for the liberty of it. Stilling fleet.

The fury of zealots, intestine bitterness and division, were the greatest occasion of the destruction of Jerusalem. King Charles.

Are not those men too often the greatest zealots who are most notoriously ignorant? True zeal should always begin with true knowledge, and thence proceed to an unwearied passion, for what it once knows to be worthy of such passion. Sprat.

No wonder that so many of these deluded zealots have been engaged in a cause which they at first abhorred, and have wished or acted for the success of an enterprize, that might have ended in the extirpation of the protestant religion. Addison.

Bp. Taylor.

This day, at height of noon, came to my sphere,
A spirit, zealous, as he seem'd, to know
More of the Almighty's works. Milton, P. L.

We should be not only devout towards God, but zealous towards men; endeavouring by all prudent means to recover them out of those snares of the devil, whereby they are taken captive.
Decay of Chr. Piety.

It is not at all good to be zealous against any person, but only against their crimes. It is better to be zealous for things than for persons: but then it should be only for good things; a rule that does certainly exclude all manner of zeal for ill things, all manner of zeal for little things.
Sprat, Serm.

Being instructed only in the general, and zealous in the main design; and as finite beings not admitted into the secrets of government, the last resorts of providence, or capable of discovering the final purposes of God, they must be sometimes ignorant of the means conducing to those ends in which alone they can oppose each other. Dryden.

ZO'DIACK. n. s. [zodiaque, French; ζωδιακὸς, ἐκ τῶν ζώων, the living creatures, the figures of which are painted on it in globes.]

1. The track of the sun through the twelve signs; a great circle of the sphere, containing the twelve signs.

The golden sun salutes the morn,
And having gilt the ocean with his beams,
Gallops the zodiack in his glist'ring coach. Shaks.
Years he number'd scarce thirteen,
When fates turn'd cruel:
Yet three fill'd zodiacks had he been
The stage's jewel. B. Jonson.

It exceeds even their absurdity to suppose the zodiack and planets to be efficient of, and antecedent to themselves, or to exert any influences before they were in being. Bentley.

Here in a shrine that cast a dazzling light,
Sat fixt in thought the mighty Stagyrite;
His sacred head a radiant zodiack crown'd,
And various animals his sides surround. Pope.

2. It is used by Milton for a girdle.

By his side,
As in a glistering zodiack, hung the sword

ZONE. n. s. [ζωνὴ; zona, Lat.]

1. A girdle.

The middle part
Girt like a starry zone his waist, and round
Skirted his loins, and thighs, with downy gold
And colours dipp'd in heav'n. Milton, P. L.
An embroider'd zone surrounds her waist.
Dryden.

Thy statue, Venus, though by Phidias' hands
Design'd immortal, yet no longer stands;
The magick of thy shining zone is past,
But Salisbury's garter shall for ever last.
Granville.

Scarce could the goddess from her nymphs be known,
But by the crescent and the golden zone. Pope.

2. A division of the earth.

The whole surface of the earth is divided into five zones: the first is contained between the two tropicks, and is called the torrid zone. There are two temperate zones, and two frigid zones. The northern temperate zone is terminated by the tropick of Cancer and the arctick polar circle: the southern temperate zone is contained between the tropick of Capricorn and the polar circle: the frigid zones are circumscribed by the polar circles, and the poles are in their centres.

True love is still the same: the torrid zones,
And those more frigid ones,
It must not know:
For love grown cold or hot,
Is lust or friendship, not
The thing we show;
For that 's a flame would die,
Held down or up too high:
Then think I love more than I can express,
And would love more, could I but love the less.
Suckling.

And as five zones th' etherial regions bind,
Five correspondent are to earth assign'd:
The sun, with rays directly darting down,
Fires all beneath, and fries the middle zone.
Dryden.

ZOO'GRAPHY. n. s. [of ζωὴ and γράφω.] A description of the forms, natures, and properties of animals.

If we contemplate the end, its principal final cause being the glory of its Maker, this leads us into divinity; and for its subordinate, as it is designed for alimental sustenance to living creatures, and medicinal uses to man, we are thereby conducted into zography. Glanville, Scepsis.

ZOO'LOGICAL.* adj. [from zoology.] Describing living creatures.

ADDENDA.

To ABSCIND.† v. a. Bentley affords an example earlier than that which is given.

This reading does indeed make the last distich seem loose, unconnected, and abscinded from the rest. Bentley, Note on Par. Lost. B. xii. 648.

ABSCO'NDENCE.* n. s. [from abscond.] Concealment.

His next removal was into a place of retirement and abscondence.
Phillips's Life of Milton, (1694.)

To ADULTER.* v. a. This should have preceded the example from Marston, under the verb neuter; to which indeed the active definition is prefixed, viz. to stain; to pollute.

To ADVOCATE.† v. a. The earliest example of this word, which I have cited, is from Milton. I find it in use a little before the time of that example, and also soon after it.

The earl of Holland hath advocated the chancellor's cause.
Lord Strafforde's Letters, &c. (dat. 1639,) vol. ii. 378.

Comest thou hither to advocate the cause of thy client?
Bishop Sanderson's Sermons, P. II. p. 103.

To AGGLUTINATE. This is a v. a. not v. n. And the following is an earlier example than that which is given.

We remain (as it were) agglutinated to God, and governed by His inward grace. The Spiritual Conquest, Tr. 5. (1651,) p. 63.

ARGUTA'TION.* n. s. [argutatio, Latin.] Debate; cavil; disputation.

These demonstrations vindicate Thy holy name from all their devilish and frivolous argutations. Bp. Hall, Great Myst. of Godliness, § 8.

To ASTRINGE.† v. a. Barrow uses this word in its Latin sense of bind, force, or compel.

The exercise of any jurisdiction doth astringe the offender to punishment or satisfaction. Barrow on the Creed, Power of the Keys.

ATHEIST.† The following example of the word, earlier than that from Milton, is worthy of notice.

The word atheist is of a very large extent. Every polytheist is in effect an atheist: for he that multiplies a Deity, annihilates it; and he that divides it, destroys it. Fuller's Holy State, &c. (1648,) p. 364.

ATTE'NDINGLY.* adv. [from attend.] With attention.

He that reads Mr. Herbert's Poems attendingly, shall find not only the excellencies of Scripture divinity bound up in metre, but the doctrine of Rome also finely and strongly confuted.
Oley's Life of G. Herbert, (1671.)

BEAT.† n. s. The following is an example of the first definition.

The town is an ancient corporation much impoverished by the beat of the sea. State-Papers, addr. to Oliver Cromwell, ed. Nickolls, p. 157.

BEWI'TCHEDNESS.* n. s. [from bewitch.] State of being bewitched.

It is a very strange bewitchedness and depravedness in many men's appetites, that they should so cry up those mushroom teachers.
Bp. Gauden, Hierasp. (1653,) p. 280.

To BRE'AKFAST.* v. a. To furnish with a breakfast.

He rises, is saluted, and after the malmsey, or some well-spiced brewage, and better breakfasted than he whose morning appetite would have gladly fed on green figs between Bethany and Jerusalem, leaves his kind entertainer. Milton, Areopagitica.

To CANCEL.* v. n. The definition should be, To become void.

CAPER-CUTTING.* The word is an adjective, and the definition should be, Dancing in a frolicksome manner.

To CHE'ERUP, or CHI'RRUP.* v. a. [See To chirp, and To chirrup.] To make cheerful. Dr. Cheyne, the celebrated physician, repeatedly employs this word, perhaps in contempt.

They eat a luxurious supper, drink a cheeruping cup of the best, become as merry as crickets, and long to sit up later.
Cheyne, Ess. on Health, &c. (1721,) p. 80.

They retired to comfort themselves with a cheerupping cup, leaving me to pass the melancholy moments with my own apprehensions.
Cheyne, Eng. Malady, p. 328.

COMPLIMENTER.† n. s. Add an example.

If a minister talk with a great man in the ordinary course of complementing language, he shall be esteemed as ordinary complementers.
Herbert's Country Parson, (ed. 1671,) p. 136.

CONFRO'NTMENT.* n. s. [from confront.] Comparison.

I will give thee a brief of some confrontments common to them all, and then some of their excellencies apart. Oley's Life of Herbert, (1671.)

DOREE. The etymology is also said, in the Diary of an Invalid, to be a corruption of the Italian name of this fish, il janitore.

EA'TAGE.* n. s. [from eat.] Food for horses and cattle from the aftermath. See AFTER-EATAGE and AVERAGE.

To FUSE.† v. a. The following example occurs.

The purgations are designed to fuse and thin the blood.
Cheyne, Engl. Malady, (1733,) p. 147.

GRINDER.† n. s. A fifth definition may be added, viz. an oppressor. See the fifth sense of To GRIND.

The priests that jog about from shire to shire, from house to house, are great grinders. Hacket's Life of Abp. Williams, (1693,) p. 215.

HIPPISH.† adj. An earlier example is found in Cheyne.

The constant complaints, common to hyppish people, made life a burden to myself, and a pain to my friends.
Cheyne, Eng. Malad. ut supr. p. 335.

IMPRI'SONER.* n. s. [from imprison.] One who causes another to be confined in prison.

The prisoner did endeavour to escape, and the defendant commanded to stay him; and so he (the defendant, in the action for false imprisonment) was holden a principal imprisoner, as well as those that laid hands on him.
Clayton's York Reports, (1651,) p. 80.

ADDENDA.

INCLI'NABLENESS.* n. s. [from inclinable.] Favourable disposition.

The things that facilitated his conquest were — the pope's encouragement, and the inclinableness of the clergy to his cause.

Brady's Introd. to Old Eng. Hist. (1684,) p. 16.

INCONSUMPTIBLE.† This word, of which so much is said, is of the Elizabethan age.

Cyprian doth not call this sacrament the only inconsumptible victim.

Fulke on the Rhemish N. Test. 1 Cor. x. 21.

INFORM.† Bishop Jeremy Taylor also uses this adjective.

The lawyers and physicians distinguish the time of the abortion; if the child was efformed into human shape, it is capital by the laws; but not, if it was inform and unshapen.

Bp. Taylor, Duct. Dubitant. (ed. 1696,) p. 789.

INSOLENCE.† This substantive was formerly used (like insolent for unaccustomed) in the sense of unusualness. See INSOLENT.

My lord, the insolence of this address will hereafter receive an alloy, even in your lordship's own judgement.

Martin's Hosannah, Serm. at Oxf. (1660,) Dedication.

To KERSEN, or KIRSEN.* v. a. This appears to have been an old way of writing christen, as well as now in some places of pronouncing it; which should be added to what I have said of this verb.

It is lawful to kyrson a child, &c.

Protest. in 1536, &c. Strype's Eccl. Mem. Records, vol. i. p. 176.

MEDIOCRE.† adj. Warburton in a note on Shakspeare's K. Lear uses this word, and Edwards in his Canons of Criticism appears to ridicule it as an affected term. Can. of Crit. ed. 1758, p. 98.

To MISTATE. This word, and MISTATEMENT, ought to be written MIS-STATE, MIS-STATEMENT.

NAUSEA'TION.* n. s. [from To nauseate.] The act of nauseating

If any of our people loath this manna because they may gather it from under their feet, let not their palates be humoured in this wanton nauseation

Bp. Hall, Old Religion, Epist. Dec.

PO'LEMIST.* n. s. [πολεμιστής, Gr.] A controvertist.

In all his writings, (Bishop Kennet's,) whether as an antiquary or a polemist, there are no traces of tergiversation or temporizing.

Nichols, Lit. Anecd. vol. i. p. 397.

PO'LEMY. n. s. [πόλεμος, Gr.] Contention; opposition; warfare. Not, however, in use, though polemical is common.

For perfect polemy in letters, you may guess what our universities can yield, by observing our trained bands at common musters.

Sir E. Dering's Speeches, (1641,) p. 150.

REMITMENT.† n. s. A second definition may be added, viz. Remission.

All law, and God's law especially, grants every where to errour easy remitments.

Milton, Tetrachordon.

To REMONSTRATE.* v. a. The following example is a century older than that which has been given.

Her majesty's party and priests did so pleasingly remonstrate to him the sin of this amour.

Sir J. Reresby's Memoirs, p. 230.

SURD.† Add this example to the third definition.

The effect of surd necessity.

Baxter on the Soul, vol. ii. p. 395.

VIDUA'TION. n. s. [from viduatus, Lat.] Loss; bereavement; deprivation.

Their triumphs rise from the church's viduation, from her learning's contempt and prosternation.

Waterhouse, Apol. for Learning, (1653,) p. 149.

UNCTION.† To the concluding definition add this apposite example from Johnson's biographer.

Boswell's Life of Johnson.

usually attributed to K. Charles I. a belief indeed many years since asserted; and again, very recently, with new circumstances of application to his pen. He has been also supposed to have written the book entitled A Discourse of Artificial Handsomeness, of which Bishop Jeremy Taylor has been pronounced the author. Bishop Heber, in his late Life of Taylor, ascribes this discourse to a female pen; but there are parts in it which often resemble Gauden's best manner, though his style is generally florid or ostentatious. The Preface, however, to this discourse also assigns, artfully perhaps, the composition to a female pen - -	Ch. I. Ch. II.

Junius, R. Sinne Stigmatized. Divided into the Drunkard's Character, and Compleat Armour against Evill Society. An octavo of near 900 pages, in many of which are very acute and forcible passages and descriptions. It is dedicated to bishop Hall, to whom, as to other authors, he professes his obligations; commencing his address with this just and pithy remark. "Right reverend father, and no lesse honoured lord, I see many make use of your lines, few acknowledge, none return to give thanks! But no cheating like the fellony of wit; for hee which theeves that, robs the owner, and coosens all that heare him." And yet this passage is not particularly acknowledged, which it ought to have been, as borrowed from Feltham's Resolves. This theft has been detected by Mr. Payne Collier, the author of a very ingenious publication, entitled The Poetical Decameron, 1820. Phillips, Edw. Complete Collect. of the Poets, or Theatrum Poetarum, New World of Words. This person was the nephew of Milton; and many of the criticisms in the first-named book, bespeaking the hand of a master, are justly, I think, believed to be Milton's. He published also the dictionary, entitled, The New World of English Words; and here again he was perhaps somewhat indebted to the labours of his immortal kinsman: for, as Aubrey informs us, the imperfect Latin Dictionary of Milton in manuscript came into his hands, which, many years after the publication of his World of Words, had been obtained by the editors of the Cambridge Latin and English Dictionary, as the Preface to that Dictionary informs us	Ch.
